

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Introduction

I

THE craft of the scop was valued as highly among the Anglo-Saxons of Britain as it was among Continental Teutons, and his work was ever sure of cordial welcome wherever the English tongue was understood. The Song of Beowulf and the fragmentary Fight at Finnsburh do not, we may be sure, represent more than a small fraction of the cycles of heroic poems that rose and flourished in Northumbria in the centuries following the settlement in Britain of the Angles and Saxons. The Beowulf itself is but a single member of such a cycle, though doubtless an important one, and presupposes in its hearers a familiarity with other songs closely linked to it. Of such songs the Fight at Finnsburh is the sole surviving example.

Yet few as are the fragments that have come down to us of that glorious body of epic verse, we are rich indeed compared with the other Germanic races. The old Icelandic sagas contain the materials for many epic poems, but they were at best only vivid narratives in prose. Even when a gentler faith than that of Thunar and Wodan had claimed our rugged forefathers, the old songs of the race-heroes retained their charm; the joy in the familiar formulæ and consecrated mystic words was no less keen during many generations. The fierce tone of the older heathen poetry was softened by later Christian adapters and reciters to suit the changed spirit of the time, but their pious interpolations sound strangely out of place in the grim songs of war. Next, the national genius for epic narration came to be employed on the events recorded in the Old and New Testaments, and as was to be expected in a land where, during the dark ages of its history, the only refuges of culture and learning were the monasteries, most of the epic poetry of the Anglo-Saxons belongs to this class. Even this form of inspiration, however, had ceased long before Alfred the Great was born, and the living source seemed to have dried up. In the long struggle against the Northmen the monks had ample materials indeed, but scant leisure for the cultivation of epic poetry, in times when monasteries were often in flames and monks in flight. They continued nevertheless to copy out and lovingly study and cherish the older poetry, and even imitated it, for more than two centuries longer.

With this gradual dying out of the traditional legend-poetry went the awakening and development of a new form of epic narrative. At the close of the tenth century, when the final scenes were enacting before England fell entirely under Danish dominion, there was composed a short epic poem like and yet not like its predecessors; like in its forms, with the old alliterative metre, the old formulæ, but unlike in subject, tone and conception. The Battle of Maldon treats not of legendary heroes of the Germanic races but of an actual historical personage, an English hero and patriot, fallen in battle against the foreign invader a very short time before the poem was made. A single event in contemporary history is here described with hardly suppressed emotion by one who knew his hero and loved him. There is none of the allusiveness and excursiveness of the Beowulf; we have here not a member of an epic cycle but an independent song. Very striking is the absence of ornament from the Battle of Maldon; all is plain, blunt, stern.¹ Yet this directness, this simplicity produce on the hearer or reader a deeper effect than mere verbosity would have done. Like Beowulf in the older poem, Byrhtnoth here fills the central position; his noble figure emerges from the general cowardice of England's rulers with their tribute-paying to greedy Danes. The venerable leader rides up and down marshalling and encouraging his little force hastily summoned from plough and herd; then he dismounts among his own immediate retainers and the fight begins. When he falls his faithful henchmen vow to avenge his death. One after the other they appear before us, say their word, hurl their spear or deal their sword-stroke, and so perish. The cowardice of a few merely acts as a foil to the devotion of the majority. Loyalty to one's friend and lord; in this consists the predominant "note" of the poem. We think of the faithful Wiglaf who stands by Beowulf when the other followers have deserted him, terrified by the fiery breath of the dragon. "Germanic poetry can show no fairer nor more powerful picture of true loyalty, and what Tacitus wrote (of the ancient Germans) is fully justified: 'Base it is for a chief to be less brave than his followers; base too for these not to equal the valour of their leader. But it is a lifelong infamy, it is utterly shameful, when the followers leave their dead lord on the field of battle.'"²

When we reach the end of the poem we are out of breath ; there remains with us a vision of flying darts, of brandished swords, sounds as of breastplates hacked, of cries and groans, while over all wheel the raven and the eagle. There remains too a feeling of pride in the old patriot and of admiration for the doomed bands of devoted men. And our pride and admiration are not wasted ; for all we have read really happened. To the question Who was the author of the poem, no answer can be given, but we may venture a guess as to what manner of man he was. There is reason for believing that he was either himself an eyewitness of the fight or else had the details from eyewitnesses. He cannot have actually taken part in the fighting, or else he would not have reproached the fugitives.¹ His use of the words gebyrde ic seems to favour the supposition that he was not an eyewitness, which is further confirmed by the absence of any words implying his presence.² More likely than not he may have been one of the Ely monks to whom Byrhtnoth had been so good a friend and patron. Perhaps too he may have been one of that sad band that went to the field of battle when the slaughter was over and the Northmen gone, and brought back for honourable burial in their monastery the headless body of their benefactor.

The poem is undoubtedly meant for oral delivery and presupposes in its hearers a knowledge of the events and persons it mentions, and this explains why only certain isolated moments in the action are brought into prominence. In its language the Battle of Maldon has much affinity with the Song of Beowulf, but more perhaps with the Old English sacred epic poetry. There are but few compound words, however, no similes, and only six

Kenningar,¹ but epic formulæ are numerous.² The versification exhibits not a few violations of the rules of alliterative verse, though the purity of the actual alliteration is preserved. Rhyme³ is employed to some extent.

Nowhere can the decay of the old poetry be better seen than in the songs scattered up and down the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. Even the longest and best written of their number, the Battle of Brunanburh, is but a simulacrum, a ghost of the older epos; the others are not even ghosts, they are caricatures. We may indeed admire the skill with which the traditional phraseology is used. In metrical technique these poems surpass the Battle of Maldon; in substance they are far beneath it. They are evidently mere products of monkish learning inserted in the annals instead of prose entries, and thus from the first were intended to be read. But in one respect they are nearer to the Battle of Maldon than to the older epic poetry; they deal with actual historical events and persons with which their authors were contemporary. To what slavish extent these topical songs, as they may be called, imitate the older poetry will be realized when we find that nearly fifty per cent. of the half-verses of the Battle of Brunanburh are to be found in earlier poems. There is only one perfect rhyme.

Very different from these songs, constructed on the traditional alliterative system of versification, are certain other metrical entries in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. Here a new metre and a new style of writing emerge for the first time in the history of English literature. What separates these songs from those written in faultless alliterative verse is not so much the rudeness of their metre, which indeed is of a different type, as their popular tone. The monks who wrote them have clearly lost touch with the metrical tradition. Wishing to write annals in verse they use the metre most familiar to them, that of the people's song; the words used are still those of the classical tongue, mixed, however, with popular elements. We are thus at a point in our literature where new forces are beginning to operate, new forms are beginning to clothe utterance. These songs of "irregular" metre mark the transition from the Old English or Anglo-Saxon into the earliest Middle English poetry such as we find it in the Brut of Layamon, and as it might have continued to be, had not the influence of Norman models overpowered these feeble native beginnings.

As all three classes of the later Anglo-Saxon poetry thus differ among themselves, we may infer that their respective authors belonged to different social classes. The poet of the Battle of Maldon, for instance, shows a Christian spirit, but his poem is entirely secular and heroic. The authors of the imitative annal-poems were evidently monks learned in the older poetical lore, who were connected with the royal court, and they made it their business to sing the praises of the English Kings. Æthelstan, Edmund, Edgar, Edward the Confessor, and Harold; all these names appear. The poems of the third class were neither courtly nor learned, and at least two of them were written at periods subsequent to the dates under which they were entered.¹

II

A. Apart from the poem our sources of information regarding the battle of Maldon are very meagre. In the Parker MS. of the Anglo-Saxon chronicle there occurs the following entry under the date 993:—

“ In this year came Unlaf with ninety-three ships to Stan [Folkstone], and laid waste the country round about, and from there he went to Sandwich and so on to Ipswich and harried all the country. And then he came to Maldon where the ealdorman Byrhtnoth with his force came to meet him and fought against him. And they slew the ealdorman there and were masters of the field of battle, and afterwards peace was made with them and the King received him at the Bishop's hands.”

The other MSS. of the Chronicle also mention very briefly that Byrhtnoth was slain at Maldon, but the entries here are in each case under the date 991. It seems better to adopt the earlier date, which is confirmed by the late Ramsey history; the Parker MS. confuses the events of two distinct invasions. Moreover no documents bearing Byrhtnoth's signature are found of a date later than 990. In the Life of Oswald, Archbishop of York, written a few years after the battle of Maldon, Byrhtnoth's heroism and death are alluded to in the following passage:—

“ Not many months after [a battle against the Danes in Wessex], there took place in the east of this famous district another heroic battle, in which the renowned general Byrhtnoth distinguished himself with his fellow-soldiers. Who has sufficient elegance of diction to relate how gloriously, how heroically, how gallantly he incited his officers to the combat? There he stood, his lofty form towering above the rest; not Aaron nor Hur strengthened his arm, but the love of the Lord so variously manifested; for indeed the man was worthy thereof. With his right arm he dealt blow on blow, unmindful of the swan-like whiteness of his head, for his alms and holy masses protected him. With his left arm he defended himself, forgetting his bodily weakness, for his prayers and good actions sustained him. And when the noble leader beheld the enemy charging and his own men bravely fighting and slaying great numbers of them, he began to fight gallantly for his country. Of the enemy and on our side was slain a countless multitude; Byrhtnoth fell; the rest fled. The Danes suffered prodigious loss; scarcely had they men enough left to man their ships."

This flowery passage unfortunately does not add to what we learn from the Chronicle, but such as it is, we have in it a nearly contemporary and therefore valuable confirmation of the latter. Of course it is possible that the writer may have been acquainted with the poem, though he makes no mention of it.

Much later accounts of Byrhtnoth's last battle as well as of his march to the battle are found in the Histories of Ramsey and Ely, both written probably not earlier than the middle of the twelfth century. A translation of the two passages will be found in the Appendix to the Introduction, p. xvii. Freeman is of opinion that both these monkish chronicles are "mixed up with a good deal of fable."¹ Referring to the story of the hospitality shown by the monks of Ely to Byrhtnoth to the detriment of the rival monastery, he says: "This is hardly history; we recognize too clearly the stories of Gideon and the elders of Succoth and of David and Abiathar the Priest . . . It is hard to see how a march to Maldon from any part of Brihtnoth's government could lead him by either Ramsey or Ely. The Ely history escapes this difficulty by making him Earl of the Northumbrians instead of the East-Saxons and by making two battles instead of one."² Our sense of probability is further offended by the mention of fourteen days for the duration of the fight. The story of Byrhtnoth making his will on the field of battle just before expiring, though creditable to monkish ingenuity, is hardly convincing. The historian of Ely tries hard to make a victory of Byrhtnoth's defeat, in contrast to the uncompromising words of the Life of Oswald, "Byrhtnoth fell, the rest fled." Another minor objection is that Wulfsige was not made abbot of Ely until after Byrhtnoth's death.

Florence of Worcester under date 991 mentions the battle, Byrhtnoth's death and the victory of the Danes. The loss on both sides, he says, was very heavy. According to him the leaders of the Danes were Justin (the Norse Iosteinn) and Guthmund son of Steita. Henry of Huntingdon also has a short notice of Byrhtnoth's death.

Of Byrhtnoth's life we know but little. From the poem (l. 92) we learn that he was the son of Byrht-helm, whom Freeman inclines to identify with Byrhtnoth the Thane, to whom a grant of land was made by King Edgar in 967. Byrhtnoth, the hero of the poem, was the uncle of another famous man, Æthelwine, ealdorman of East Anglia, whom he joined in supporting the cause of the monks against the Mercian ealdorman Ælfhere, who desired to replace them with secular clergy. Byrhtnoth married Ælfæd, daughter of Ælfgar, his predecessor in the ealdormanship of Essex. From his wife's sister, Æthelfæd, widow of King Edmund II, Byrhtnoth inherited large bequests of property which, on his death, passed to his widow. The latter left lands and ecclesiastical furniture and vestments to the monastery of Ely, "where my lord's body rests." She is further said to have left the monastery a tapestry portraying her husband's exploits. There are charters extant with Byrhtnoth's signature, and mention of him is made in others.

Regarding the site of the battle of Maldon we cannot do better than give Freeman's account, taken from his admirable description of the battle, based on the poem¹ : —

"The battle took place near the town of Maldon, on the banks of the tidal river Panta, now called the Blackwater. The town lies on a hill ; immediately at its base flows one branch of the river, while another, still crossed by a mediæval bridge, flows at a little distance to the north. The Danish ships seem to have lain in the branch nearest to the town and their crews must have occupied the space between the two streams, while Brihtnoth came to the rescue from the north. He seems to have halted on the spot now occupied by the church of Heybridge, having both streams between him and the town."

That the Northmen were to the south of the men of Essex is confirmed by a line (134) of the poem where "the seafarer sends a spear from the south." Elsewhere (l. 97) we are told that "the host of wikings crossed westward over Panta," a statement which seems to imply that the armies were not at first opposite to each other, or else that the water was shallower to the west.²

B. The Battle of Brunanburh is mentioned in two of the MSS. of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle under the date 937. One, Laud 636, merely states that "King Æthelstan led an army to Brunanburh," while the other, Domit. A viii, records that : —

"King Æthelstan [and Edmund his brother] led an army to Brunanburh and there fought against Anelaf and, Christ helping, had the victory [and there slew five kings and eight eorls]."

The battle is further mentioned in over a dozen later annals and histories, four of which are Celtic.

The Danes that lived north of the Humber and formed the bulk of the population there had grown impatient of the rule of Æthelstan, King of Wessex, and had formed a league with their kinsmen in Ireland under the two Olafs together with the Scottish King Constantine and the Strathclyde Britons under their King Eugenius. The united army of the confederacy met in the south of Northumbria, the Olafs bringing their men by sea from Dublin. Æthelstan knew beforehand of the conspiracy, and at once marched north and met the unwieldy force opposed to him on the field of Brunanburh, where he utterly defeated them with immense slaughter and pursued the remnant to the sea. This battle is one of the most decisive in English history. It put an end to the conspiracy of the Danish population of Northumbria with other races against the overlordship of the Wessex kings. The importance of the victory gained by King Æthelstan was recognized at the time, as may be seen from the triumphant tone of the poem and other almost contemporary allusions. Nevertheless, as Green points out, Brunanburh failed to unite Northumbria to the realm of the kings of Wessex, who were obliged after a time "to restore the old under-kingship with the isolated life which that kingship embodied."

The site of Brunanburh has not been identified, though the claims of a number of places have been urged. Among the later annals the name of the place where the great battle was fought is variously given. The Pictish Chronicle calls it "bellum Duinbrunde." The Annals of Clonmacnoise speak of "the plains of Othlyn." In the Life of Æthelweard the ealdorman it is called "Brunnandune." The Gesta Regum Anglorum et Dacorum have "Wendune," which is confirmed by Simeon of Durham's "Weondune, also called Etbrunnanwerc or Brunnanry-rig." The Egilssaga has "Winheiði við Vinnskóga," i. e. "Winheath by Winwood." It is clear that researches must be restricted to a region where the various elements of the confederate army could have most easily met, and this would have been in the west of Great Britain. Here the Danes from Dublin, the Scots, and the men of Strathclyde could have met together without loss of time. Consequently Florence of Worcester's statement that Olaf appeared in the mouth of the Humber with his ships seems untenable. We learn from the poem that the pursuit lasted a whole day, so that the battle must have been fought at a considerable distance from that part of the coast where the Danish ships were lying.

Among the places put forward as the site may be mentioned Bromborough on the Mersey; Bramber, south of the Ribble near Preston; and Burnswark, a hill in Dumfriesshire. Something may be said for the claims of each of these places, especially of Bramber, for in its neighbourhood there was found in 1840 a great hoard of silver ingots and coins, none later than the year 930. This might well have been the war-chest of the confederate army. "The Irish Danes," says the supporter of this view, "might well have sailed up the Ribble; the great Roman Road to the north would have afforded an easy natural route for the Scots, and if the Northumbrians came at all, they could have come without difficulty by the Roman road from York to Manchester."¹

In the poem (l. 54) we find the words dinges mere or dynges mere. If they are the name of a lake or an estuary, as seems probable, its identification would throw light on the much disputed site of the battle.

APPENDIX TO INTRODUCTION

I

In the History of Ramsey, Chapter LXXI, entitled De Brithnoto Comite, runs as follows : —

“ At that time there was a certain Earl named Brithnoth, who, having a strong regard for the Church of Ramsey, is recorded to have bestowed upon it as a free gift under a charter of King Edward two manors, Isham and Wythenton. He was an eminent and distinguished man of noble birth and great wealth, but his chief title to fame is the military ardour he so often displayed against the enemies of his country. On one occasion he was, according to his wont, proceeding to fight against the Danes, who had disturbed that part of the kingdom. Passing Ramsey on his way by boat, accompanied by a large force, he sent to ask the Abbot, the above mentioned Wulfsige, to furnish him and his men with entertainment. The Abbot, with thoughtless ridicule for the extravagance of the request, sent back answer that he had not enough bread for so great a host, as his larder was unequal to the demand. However, if Brithnoth liked, he was at liberty to come and dine with six or eight of his retinue, but he must seek elsewhere to satisfy the hunger of the army. On receiving this reply that noble man was exceeding wroth, but he held his peace and retired, deeming it nobler to continue his fast in company with his army than eat his fill while the soldiers went hungry. Now the Abbot and monks of Ely, seeing in this repulse an opportunity of gaining the goodwill of so eminent a man, sent to meet him and liberally entertained the hungry men, asking no fee for their kindly hospitality. Thus at a trifling cost they gained the favour which they knew we had forfeited by the afore-mentioned wicked carelessness, and they inherited from him many ample gifts of lands, some of which he had promised to the Church of Ramsey after his death. Nevertheless, afterwards being wounded in battle and near unto death he made a will leaving us a hide of land at Dodinton, not wishing to seem quite unmindful of his early affection.”

Chapter VI of the second book of the History of Ely is entitled De venerabili duce Brithnodo qui dedit Sanctæ Ædelredæ (here follow the names of the places given).

“Concerning the eminent and famous Brithnoth a remarkable account has come down to us. His righteous life and actions are recorded in the histories of England in terms of highest praise, and from them we will, with the reader’s permission, excerpt a few facts, paying no regard to the manner of telling. For the subject is an important one and well worthy of our ancestors’ notice, and it is not without a feeling of shame for our arid style of composition that we, weak and inarticulate, venture on its narration. This famous man then, chief of the Northumbrians, was a brave leader, and by virtue of the wonderful prudence and bravery with which he defended himself and his followers, he received from all men the English name of Ealdorman, that is, Elder or Chief. He was eloquent, robust, of great bodily stature, untiring in his campaigns against the foes of the kingdom, and remarkably brave and free from the fear of death. Moreover he on all occasions respected Holy Church and the servants of God, and devoted the whole of his patrimony to their use, and ever stood forth as a bulwark on behalf of religious orders against those who endeavoured to disturb the sacred foundations. For when certain nobles were desirous of expelling the monks and restoring to the Church those who had been previously expelled by Edgar and the holy Æthelwold, this truly religious man strenuously resisted their insane greed in the council, saying that he could not possibly suffer to be expelled from the kingdom those monks who had kept alive religion in the kingdom. He devoted his life while it lasted to the defence of his country’s freedom, preferring death to leaving his country’s wrongs unavenged. In those days there took place frequent invasions of England by the Danes, who, coming by ship, committed grievous devastations in various districts. The leading men of these districts placed themselves under the guidance of Brithnoth as of an invincible patron, by virtue of his honourable character, so that under his protection they might defend themselves the better against the enemy. Accordingly on one occasion, when report reached him that the Danes had landed at Maldon, he met them with an armed force and slew them almost all on the bridge over the river.¹

"A few managed to get away and escaped to their own country to tell the tale. After this victory Brithnoth returned speedily to Northumbria, while the Danes, greatly cast down at the event, fitted out a fleet afresh. Hastening to England four years afterwards they landed at Maldon under Justin and Guthmund, son of Stectan, with a view to avenging the slaughter of their fellow-countrymen. On reaching the pant, and learning what Brithnoth had done to their own people, they sent word to him that they had come to avenge them and should hold him a coward if he refused to join battle. Brithnoth, inflamed to a pitch of daring by this message, summoned his former companions in arms to aid in the enterprise, and with a few men-at-arms marched off to give battle. Inspired by hope of success and by his own adventurous spirit, he strained every means and made all haste to prevent the hostile force from occupying a single foot's length of ground in his absence. On his way he came near the Abbey of Ramsey and asked the Abbot Wulfsgie to grant him and his men shelter and entertainment. To this a reply was given that the abbey could not furnish so great a multitude, but that, in order that he might not thus depart unsatisfied, entertainment would be provided for himself and seven of his people. 'Tell the lord Abbot,' he is said to have answered, 'that I care not to dine without my men, inasmuch as I cannot fight without them.' And so departing he came to the church of Ely, and sent word to Abbot Ælfsige that he would pass the island with a small troop on his way to battle, and would dine with the Abbot if it were his pleasure, bringing with him his army. The Abbot, with the full consent of his society, made answer that in a work of charity he was deterred by no immensity of numbers but rejoiced rather at their coming. Thus was Brithnoth received and with his army entertained with royal hospitality, and he was moved by the unremitting attention of the monks to a great affection for the place. For indeed he would have accounted none of his actions righteous, had he let this courtesy of the monks go unrewarded. Remembering, therefore, that they had been at no small pains for his sake, on the following day he entered the chapter-house to receive the brethren, and thanking the Abbot and monastery for their generous entertainment he bestowed on them as a reward for their liberality the following important manors . . . And further, disclosing the occasion of his journey he made over other manors, to wit . . . with their appurtenances, and over and above these, thirty marks of gold and twenty pounds of silver, on condition that if peradventure he should fall in battle they were to bring his body and bury it there. . . . Then, commending himself to the prayers of the brethren he hastened with his men to give battle. On his arrival neither the small numbers of his own force nor the multitude of the enemy dismayed him, but straightway he fell upon them and fought with them desperately for fourteen days. On the last day, when but a few of his men survived, and he knew that he should die, he was still fighting with untiring vigour. There was a vast slaughter of the enemy, whom he well-nigh put to flight; but taking heart from the paucity of his followers they formed a wedge and hurling themselves forward like one man succeeded after huge efforts in cutting off his head as he fought. Taking it with them they fled to their own country. And the Abbot, hearing of the issue of the battle, went to the field with some monks and seeking out the hero's body bore it back to the church and buried it honourably, placing a round lump of wax where the head should have been. Long afterwards it was recognised by this sign and reinterred in state among the rest. This pious and strenuous man lived in the days of Edgar, Edward King and Martyr, and Æthelred, all kings of England; and he died in the fourteenth year of rule of the same Æthelred, in the nine hundred and ninety-first year from the incarnation of our Lord."

POEMS OF IRREGULAR METRE IN THE ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE. See Introduction, pp. ix, x.

These poems occur under the following years:—

959. King Edgar's reign.

975. a) King Edgar's death.

b) Persecution of monks.

979. Death of Edward the Martyr.
 1011. Laying waste of Canterbury.
 1057. Edward Ætheling.
 1067. Margaret wooed by Malcolm.
 1086. William the Conqueror.

They are written in a metre, which, strongly marked and carefully observed in some cases, is in others hardly to be distinguished from prose. The most perfect examples are to be found under dates 959 and 1086, referring to King Edgar and William the Conqueror respectively. (See Appendix to Text.) The first consists of double-stress short verses, which do not exactly rhyme but mostly end in the unaccented vowel e; while the second poem consists of rhyming couplets. In the first poem the stresses or beats are the important part of the metre; in the second the rhyme has the chief place. Professor Trautmann, in Anglia, vol. vii, Anzeiger, pp. 211 ff., considers the metre of these songs to be of the same kind as the four-stress verses used by Abbot Ælfric and in Germany by Otfrid. It was, as Wackernagel first suggested, an imitation of the iambic dimeter acatalectic or rhythmic Ambrosian hymns of the Latin Church, of the kind that Aldhelm, Boniface and Alcuin made, and was not derived from the classical alliterative metre. Trautmann would thus divide each song into long lines, each line containing two double-stress half-lines, which often rhyme together. The most noticeable thing about the poem on William the Conqueror is the rhyming, that is carried out consistently though crudely. Indeed the rhyme of this poem is more developed even than in the Brut of Layamon. Some of the rhymes are perfect, as haran and faran; others are merely approximate, as hinde and blendan, ahebban and tellan (end-rhyme).¹

THE TEXT

IN this edition the text of the Battle of Maldon has been collated with Hearne's transcript of the lost Cotton MS. Otho A. xii., 3, represented in the variants by H. All deviations from the text of Hearne are indicated in the variants. Additions to the text and letters substituted for others are placed in brackets, but the common contractions used by the scribe are expanded without indication. The punctuation and the use of capitals are modern. The variant readings from other editions given by Wülcker (Bibl. der angels. Poesie I. 358-373) have been collated with the editions themselves, but in general such readings only from these editions have been included in the variants as involve a change of meaning or of metre. Evident misprints have not been recorded, and normalized spellings have usually not been given. The varied punctuation of these editions is not indicated in the variants, but may be found in Wülcker. Several editions that have appeared since Wülcker's edition have also been collated, and the variant readings included.

The editions, besides Hearne's, cited in the variants are: Th. = Thorpe's; Mü. = Müller's; Ettm. = Ettmüller's; Gr. = Grein's; Rie. = Rieger's; *Sw.*¹ and *Sw.*⁷ = Sweet's first and seventh editions, or Sw. when both agree (the text was revised in the fourth edition and remained unchanged in the seventh); Kö. = Körner's; Z. = Zernial's (trans.); Wül. = Wülcker's; *Kl.*¹ and *Kl.*³ = Kluge's first and third editions, or Kl. when both agree; Bright = Bright's. As used in the variants Edd. means these editions only. For titles see the Bibliography. The collation of the editions, except Hearne's, was made by the General Editor. The text of Thorpe used in collating was the revised edition (*Th.*², first published in 1846), a copy, dated 1868, from the Library of the University of Chicago; the copy of Müller was from the same Library; the copies of Körner and Zernial from the Library of Harvard University, whence also a second copy of Müller.

THE TEXT

THE text of the Short Poems from the Saxon Chronicle has been collated with the MSS. on which it is based. Poems I, II, III a, and III b, follow the Cotton MS. Tib. A. vi; poems IV and V follow Cotton Tib. B. 1. The variants given from other MSS. are taken from Wülcker, and have been collated with the MSS., except in the case of the Parker MS. (Corpus Christi, Cambridge), the readings from which, given by Wülcker, have been collated with Plummer's text in his Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel. The variants given usually involve a change of meaning and are not complete, except for the MS. on which the text is based.

In the Songs in Irregular Metre the text given by Plummer has been collated with the MSS. The text follows Laud 636.

Notes

NOTES TO THE BATTLE OF MALDON

For an account of the poem see Introduction, pp. vi ff., xi ff.

I, 1. The first part of the poem, most likely only a few lines, is lost, the unique MS. in which it was preserved having been mutilated at the beginning and end.

I, 2. hors forlætan. In England at this period battles were fought on foot. The leaders were mounted and rode up and down the ranks of their armies marshalling and exhorting the troops, as below, l. 17 ff.; but they dismounted when the battle was about to begin, cf. l. 23. The Northmen used horses for the purpose of moving rapidly from place to place in their raids. The subject of hēt is Byrhtnoth.

I, 5. Offan mæg, not named. Offa is mentioned l. 286.

I, 6. ðæt introduces a noun clause in apposition to explanatory of the preceding ðæt in l. 5; se eorl, Byrhtnoth; yrhðo, 'slackness.'

I, 7. him is reflexive with fleogan; cf. ll. 40, 300.

I, 8. The fact that one of the English leaders was amusing himself with a falcon just before the battle denotes an unusual degree of contempt for the foe, the commonly dreaded Northmen. The History of Ely (see Introduction, p. xviii ff.) mentions that Byrhtnoth had inflicted a crushing defeat on an army of Northmen a few years previously, and that he now advanced against the enemy with a small force. In l. 89 we are told of his ofermōd.

I, 9. cniht, like the German knecht, orig. meant 'youth,' then 'attendant,' 'servant,' but later on it acquired, as 'knight,' a nobler sense. The word cild, 'child,' underwent a somewhat similar change.

I, 11. Eadric, like most of the personages mentioned by name in the poem, was one of Byrhtnoth's retinue of well-born personal followers, his winemægas.

I, 12. frēan merely repeats the sense of ealdre in l. 11.

This repetition of a word or phrase that has occurred in the previous line is a characteristic of Old English verse that became almost an abuse in later poetry.

1, 15. bēot hē gelæste. Mention is made several times in this poem and in Beowulf of boasts made by warriors in their intervals of leisure, either at the 'mead-bench,' or at the 'folkstead.' Cf. ll. 200, 213, 290.

2, 19. The fighting men of the fyrð, or militia, had but imperfect ideas of military discipline, and needed the personal instruction of their general even as to the proper holding and use of their arms.

2, 20. rihte, 'straight,' 'perpendicularly,' or 'evenly,' so as to form the bordweall as a defence against the enemy's missiles, discharged at short range.

2, 22. folc, here = fyrð, cf. ll. 45, 202, 259.

2, 23. See l. 2 note.

2, 24. heorðwerod, his own household troops, all tried and devoted retainers.

2, 25. The Northman who acted as envoy had to shout so as to be heard over the river. He may have spoken his native Norse, which would not be difficult of comprehension for the English of Essex.

2, 28. hē may refer to Byrhtnoth, who had come down to the water's edge to listen to the herald.

2, 30. raðe for hraðe. In Old English MSS. of the eleventh and twelfth centuries the letter h is frequently dropped. Cf. the proper names, ll. 80, 92.

2, 31. bēag included large rings and small, whether necklets, armlets or finger-rings.

2, 32. gafole. It was the custom of the Norsemen to offer to retire from a district on receiving payment of a sum of money or treasure fixed by them. See Earle and Plummer, Saxon Chronicles, ii. 174.

2, 39. feoh, originally meaning 'cattle' (German Vieh), came to mean 'possessions,' 'money'; modern English 'fee.'

2, 40. sceattum has much the same sense as feoh, and has special reference to money paid as a tribute or levy; ūs is reflexive with an intransitive verb, cf. l. 300.

2, 41. friðes is used adverbially, 'at peace.'

3, 47. Ættrynne ord. That the English of this period used poisoned weapons is hardly likely; Ættrynne is a poetical epithet; cf. Beowulf, l. 1459, ecg wæs iren ætertānum fāh. In early Scandinavian legend swords were often endowed with magic properties, inflicting incurable wounds. Cf. l. 146.

3, 65. The Panta, or Blackwater, as it is now called, opens just at Maldon into a large estuary, where a strong tide runs.

4, 68. prasse in the four other passages where it is found (in Wulfstan 148, 32, and in Ælfric's Lives of Saints, ed. Skeat i. p. 488, ll. 25 ff.; ii. p. 86, l. 302; p. 182, ll. 208 ff., cf. Klaeber, Anglia, Beiblatt 9, 38) appears to mean 'pomp,' 'array,' 'parade.'

4, 69. æschere, 'the ship-army.' The host of Scandinavian pirates is called here in the Chronicle; the English force that opposes them is termed fyrd.

4, 70. It would seem that the bridge spanned only the deep permanent channel in the middle of the river, leaving at either end a space exposed at low-tide but submerged at high-tide, and here called ford; ll. 81, 88. The Northmen, too impatient to wait for low-tide, enter the water with the intention of forcing a passage over the bridge, but find the current still too strong for safe crossing under the missiles of the resolute band of bricgweardas. Knowing too that even should they succeed in crossing the bridge they would have further to wade across the shallow part of the river at the other side, exposed to the javelins and arrows of the whole of Byrhtnoth's force, the wily pirates ask for a truce.

4, 84. hī, the Northmen.

4, 87. ūpgang āgan, 'be allowed to mount' upon the bridge.

4, 88. ford, the shallow water on the north side.

5, 92. Byrthelmes bearn, Byrhtnoth.

5, 95. ðære wælstōwe wealdan, a poetical phrase used however in prose. Cf. Beowulf l. 2051, woldon wælstōwe, and A.-S. Chron. 999, ðā ahton ðā Deniscan wælstōwe geweald.

5, 102. wihagan for wighagan, 'battle-hedge,' formed by shields held perpendicularly and edge to edge. This formation was also called bordweall and scyldburch, cf. ll. 20, 242, 277. Cf. Cook's note, Judith (Belles-Letters Se.) l. 305.

5, 105. fæge, the Scottish fey, is frequently used in Beowulf of those destined to fall in combat.

5, 106. hremmas. The raven played an important part in the superstitions of the early Scandinavians and Teutons. It is frequently mentioned in the Icelandic poetry.

5, 107. earn. In l. 61 ff. (see p. 20) the eagle and the raven are mentioned together as carrion-feeders on the field of battle.

6, 113. wæreste gecēas. Another example of stereotyped poetic diction, cf. Beowulf l. 2902. Every scop or versifier would have hundreds of such figurative expressions stored in his memory ready for use.

6, 115. his, Byrhtnoth's. Wulfmær rashly left the ranks and advanced against the foe.

6, 117. gehyrde ic. The first person is here, as in III A. 9 mine gefræge, and in Beowulf, used in a passage where the narrator bases a statement on hearsay. It need not, however, be concluded from this that the author of the poem was not present at the battle; obviously he could not have seen all that took place, and would have to depend on other eye-witnesses to supplement his own experience.

6, 121. būrðene, 'bower-thane.' Būr meant a private dwelling or apartment, particularly a bedroom, so that būrðegn would correspond to 'chamberlain.'

6, 122. stemnetton. 'Stefn' or 'stemn' has among other meanings that of 'turn' or 'spell,' or 'a body of persons who take their turn at any work' (Bosworth-Toller sub voce). It seems, therefore, better to translate stemnetton by 'fought in their turn' than by 'stood firm,' as Sweet suggests.

6, 130. wiges, a gen. of respect.

6, 131. ðæs beornes. The use of the definite article here may be explained by supposing the narrator to be unaware that he has not previously mentioned the ceorl whom Byrhtnoth attacks. In l. 286 Offa slays 'the' seafarer. Most probably the narrator assumes that his hearers or readers are already familiar with the details of the fight.

7, 136. hē scēaf. This cannot mean that Byrhtnoth successfully parried the javelin, as he received a wound from it. The point of the weapon may have broken off and remained in the wound when he shivered the shaft with his buckler, or he may have been grazed by it.

7, 140. fyrdrinc, Byrhtnoth.

7, 143. ððerne, 'another dart.'

7, 151. Æðelrēdes ðegen, Byrhtnoth, 'King Æthelred's thane.'

7, 155. Wulfmær, apparently not the same as the Wulfmær of l. 113.

7, 156. forheardne, sc. gār.

8, 159. gesyrwed secg, another Northman, who does not wait for Byrhtnoth to fall, so eager is he to spoil the wounded hero.

8, 163. brūneccg, one of the epithets for a sword, cf. Beowulf l. 1546. As Freeman remarks, the adjective 'brown' is commonly applied to a sword in later English ballads. Perhaps it refers to the rust and blood-stains left in order to bear witness to the weapon's service and age, cf. l. 47.

8, 165. ðā hā . . . āmyrde, 'by checking.'

8, 169. hār hilderinc. In a passage from the Life of Archbishop Oswald, quoted in the Introduction, we are told that Byrhtnoth was 'unmindful of the swan-like whiteness of his head.'

8, 179. ferian is properly speaking the causative of faran, 'to go,' but is here, as in some other instances, apparently used for faran.

9, 180. The Christian English of this period no doubt regarded the heathen Northmen as in direct league with the devil. Scandinavia was not wholly converted to Christianity till near the end of the eleventh century. hī refers to sāwul, l. 177.

9, 186. wurdon is probably a mistake for wurde, and bearn should be taken as singular and referred to Godric.

9, 187. ðone gōðan, Byrhtnoth.

9, 190. It was disgraceful enough to flee from the field of battle, but to have used his lord's horse and accoutrements for that purpose would suffice to brand Godric with an ineffaceable stigma.

9, 193. wudu, the holt mentioned in l. 8.

9, 194. fæsten, perhaps the fortified town of Maldon.

9, 195-197. These lines show that not merely the common soldiers fled but also many of the leaders.

*Must be

11, 220. ætwtitan, survives in 'twit.'

11, 227. folce, 'host,' 'army,' as in l. 22.

11, 228. winas, a name applied particularly to the 'comrades,' winemāgas, who formed the retinue of a chief, who in turn was also called by them wine, frēawine, or winedryhten. Cf. ll. 248, 250, 263, 306, and see Beowulf, Glossary.

12, 242. scyldburh. See l. 102 note, and l. 277.

12, 249. Stūrmere, apparently Leofsunu's home, perhaps the estuary of the river Stour in Essex; cf. Stūremūða, where the Northmen were defeated in 885.

12, 256. Dunhere, though a ceorl, a freeman of the lowest grade, is here mentioned among his superiors for his conspicuous gallantry.

13, 265. Note the emphatic sē; cf. ll. 131, 286 notes.

13, 267. Æscferð was doubtless a hostage who had escaped from the enemy.

13, 277. bræc ðone bordweall, 'broke through' the enemy's wīghaga, and fought with them hand to hand.

14, 286. ðone sǣlidan. See l. 131 note.

14, 287. Körner thinks that by Gaddes mæg one of the Northmen is meant, in which case Gaddes mæg and ðone sǣlidan refer to one and the same person. But it is much more likely that Gaddes mæg is another of the English leaders.

14, 294. This line would have been pregnant with meaning to a contemporary Englishman, personal devotion to his lord, even to death, being the highest ideal of earthly service.

14, 295. borda gebræc. These words mark the beginning of the final stage in the fight, the fierce onslaught of the pirates, confident now of victory.

14, 300. Wigelines bearn, apparently another name for Wistān. Wigelines may well be a mistake for Wigelmes, i. e. Wigehelmes, the letter h being frequently dropped in writing.

15, 310. Liebermann suggests that eald genēat may mean 'true follower.'

15, 312. The particle ðe or ðy, used with comparatives, is the instrumental case of the neut. demonstr. pron. ðæt; sceal is used absolutely = 'shall be.'

NOTES TO SHORT POEMS FROM THE SAXON CHRONICLE

I

The Battle of Brunnanburh

For an account of this poem see Introduction, p. xiv ff.

17, 3. Edmund succeeded his half brother on the latter's death in 940.

17, 5. Brunnanburh (D, brunanburh). For the site of the battle see Introduction, p. xv; bordweall, cf. M. 277.

17, 6. hamera lāfum, cf. Beowulf, l. 2829.

17, 7. Eadweardes, the previous king, son and successor of Alfred the Great; swā him . . . cnēomāgum, 'as was natural to them from their lineage.'

17, 12. dennade. This word occurs nowhere else. The Parker MS. has dænnede, Cott. Tib. B. iv, dennode; Cott. Tib. B. i has dennade. Evidently we should read ðānode, 'became wet,' from ðān, 'wet,' 'moist.' The letter ð in the original MS. might have easily been miswritten d. From ðān is also derived the causative ðænan.

18, 15. Godes candel, a common poetical name for the sun, cf. Beowulf, l. 1572, rodorec candel.

18, 22. on lāst legdon. The more usual expression is lāst or lāstas leggan, 'to make tracks,' 'journey.' Here the meaning is 'followed in the tracks of,' 'pursued.'

18, 24. mylenscearpum, 'ground sharp on a grindstone' (mylenstān). Myrce. The Mercians formed part of Æthelstan's army. At this period Mercia included the counties of Cheshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, Gloucestershire, Staffordshire, Herefordshire, and Oxfordshire.

18, 26. Anlāfe. Anlaf is the English form of the Scandinavian Olaf. There seem to have been two Olafs present at this battle: Anlaf Cuaran, son of Sitric, Æthelstan's brother-in-law, and Anlaf, son of Godfrey, Sitric's brother.

18, 29. ciningas, chiefs of the various armies making common cause against Æthelstan.

18, 31. eorlas. Eorl is the English form of the Norse jarl.

18, 33. Norðmanna brego, Anlaf.

19, 36. feaiione may refer to the yellowish brown colour of the shallow coastal waters or of estuaries.

19, 38. his cyððe, the Highlands of Scotland, where the Scottish settlers from Ireland dwelt.

19, 42. forslegen, though grammatically agreeing with hē (Constantinus) must logically be referred to frēonda.

19, 45. beorn blandenfex, Constantinus.

19, 48. beadoweorca and the following genitives are genitives of respect with beteran.

19, 54. Dynges mere has no clear meaning unless we take it to be a proper name, and even then it has yet to be identified. If, however, it means the sea round Dungeness, we have a strong argument in favour of locating Brunanburh in the Humber. See Introduction, pp. xv-xvi.

20, 63. æftan hwit. A white tail is characteristic of a species of eagle, Aquila albicilla, found in northern latitudes.

20, 65. Wolves were common in England till much later than this period. In 1281 they are recorded to have been troublesome in several English counties.

20, 72. Wēalas, 'the Welsh,' the English name for the Britons. In V. 9, 10, (see p. 26) a distinction seems to be made between Welsh and British.

II

Edmund recovers the Five Boroughs of the Danelaw

20. From the moment of his accession in 940 Edmund met with resistance to his rule in the Danelaw. The Danes there had recovered from their defeat at Brunanburh and "again called for aid from their kinsmen in Ireland; and on the reappearance of Olaf in the Humber in 941 the Danelaw took fire. The rising was not merely a rising of the Danes north of the Humber, for after twenty years of quiet submission to the English rule even the men of the Five Boroughs now threw off their allegiance and joined their kinsmen in Northumbria in taking Olaf for king" (Green). Edmund and afterwards Edred finally subdued the Northumbrian and Mercian Danes, who were thenceforward ruled by an Ealdorman appointed by the English king.

21, 3. Dor. Dore, near Sheffield, one of the boundaries of Mercia. The name meant a 'hill' or 'water-parting.'

21, 4. Hwitanwyllesgeat, the 'Gate (or gap) of the Whitewell,' Whitewell in Derbyshire, another of the boundaries of Mercia.

21, 5. Burga fife. The Five Boroughs are here mentioned for the first time. They formed the eastern or Danish part of the old kingdom of Mercia, and were not a kingdom but a confederacy, each under its jarl.

21, 8, 9. Denum. It is better to read Denum than Dene, the reading of the other MSS., which gives no sense, unless we suppose Norðmannum to mean 'Norwegians.' In this case there may be an allusion to the appointment by King Æthelstan of Eric the Norwegian as King of Northumbria; but such an interpretation seems far-fetched. Denum, then, is to be regarded as parallel to under Norðmannum.

III A

X Edgar's Coronation

21. Edgar succeeded his brother Edwig in 959, when he was sixteen years old. Why then was he not crowned till 973, fourteen years afterwards? Freeman says this is 'one of the most puzzling things in our history.' E. W. Robertson (Essays, pp. 203-215) puts forward the theory that 'Edgar's coronation at Bath was a solemn typical enunciation of the consummation of English unity, and inauguration of the King of all the nations of England, celebrated by the two archbishops.'

21, 3. Acemannesceastre. Nothing certain is known as to the origin or meaning of this name. Plummer thinks it possible that the first part may contain the Latin aquæ, as the corresponding Latin form is Aquamania.

21, 5. A late MS. (Laud. Misc. 636) reads æt Hatabaðum, another form of the name.

22, 9. There was a monastery at Bath.

III B

Edgar's Death, Edward's Accession, &c.

23, 12. Edward the Martyr was murdered at Corfe in Dorsetshire in 979. The MS. Laud. Misc. 636 has the following entry: 'Hēr was Eadward cyng ofslogen on Efen tide at Corfes geate.' Corfes geat was a gap in the hills where Corfe castle was built at a later period.

23, 14-15. Cyneweard was Abbot of Milton and afterwards Bishop of Wells. of Brytene gewāt is thought by Stubbs to signify Cyneweard's death. This view seems to be supported by the expression ðurh gecyndne cræft, but if the Bishop's death had been meant we should have expected the writer of the 'poem' to use some of the stock phrases he had ready for such occasions, as in the first four lines. Plummer thinks the words of Brytene gewāt need mean no more than that Cyneweard 'departed from Britain,' possibly to Rome. Professor Earle considers that Cyneweard may have been the author of the three poems II, III A, and III B.

23, 18. tōdræfed. In the Life of Oswald, Archbishop of York, there is an account of this 'antimonastic reaction in Mercia under Alderman Ælfhere,' where it is stated that 'the abbots were expelled with their monks, and priests with their wives were brought in.' The movement, which was a popular one, was resisted by Æthelwine, ealdorman of East Anglia, and his uncle Byrhtnoth, ealdorman of Essex, who fought and died at Maldon. See Green, Conquest of England, p. 352.

24, 25. Öslāc had been appointed ealdorman of Bernicia and Deira in 966.

24, 26. ganotes bæð. Cf. Beowulf l. 1861. The ganot or Solan goose is a large aquatic bird of the pelican family.

24, 28. For hwæles ēðel Beowulf has (l. 10) hron-rāde.

24, 32, 35. The 'hunger' arising from a failure of the harvest would be closely connected in the popular mind with the appearance of the comet.

IV

Imprisonment and Death of Prince Alfred

24. King Cnut had designated as King of England after him his younger son by Emma of Normandy, Hardacnut. Harold, his son by an earlier marriage, was to be King of Denmark. When she married Cnut, Emma was the widow of the English King Æthelred, by whom she had two sons, Alfred and Edward, the 'Æthelings.' Thus there were four claimants to the English succession on Cnut's death. The great earl Godwine, Cnut's all-powerful minister, supported the claims of Hardacnut, for whom Emma, residing at Winchester, the Wessex capital, and protected by Cnut's bodyguard of 'huscarls,' was keeping Wessex. Prince Alfred, for some reason not clearly known, came over to England and started for Winchester on a visit to his mother. The poem relates what befel him and his followers. Popular opinion, led by Leofric, earl of Mercia, was already favourable to Harold, and now grew so exasperated against Godwine by the brutal outrage on the young prince that Harold was elected King in the year following. See Abegg, pp. 114-126.

24, 3. As Plummer observes, it is unlikely that the question of the succession prompted Alfred's visit to England, seeing that his mother was holding Wessex for his half-brother Hardacnut.

Earl Godwine was the most powerful of all the English nobles in the reign of Cnut. He had been left as governor of the realm in that King's absence, and was called in documents of the period Secundarius Regis, 'King's Deputy' or 'Viceroy.'

25, 5. hlēoðrode . . . Harolde. This gives the reason why Godwine and the other supporters of Hardacnut's claims objected to Alfred's visit, which they feared might still further complicate the question of succession, the 'popular voice pointing to Harold.'

25, 8. sume hī, 'some of them.'

25, 10. hættode. Punishment by scalping for repeated theft is mentioned in the laws of Cnut.

25, 19. lende. The island of Ely, surrounded by fen waters, could only be reached by boat. It was here that Hereward the Wake made his last stand.

V

Edward's Death

26, 1. Edward the Confessor was the son of Æthelred and Emma, and brother of the prince Alfred of the last poem.

26, 9, 10. Walum . . . Bryttum. Bryttum may here mean the people of Strathclyde or of Cornwall.

26, 17. Edward was educated and lived in Normandy, whose Duke Richard was his mother's brother.

I THE BATTLE OF MALDON

I MANUSCRIPT

The unique MS. containing the text of this poem, Cott. Otho A. xii, was destroyed by fire in 1731. It is described in Wanley's Catalogue as wanting the beginning and end.

II EDITIONS

1726. Fortunately this MS. had been printed at Oxford in 1726 by Thomas Hearne in his History of Glastonbury, Johannis Confratris et Monachi Glastoniensis Chronica siue Historia de Rebus Glastoniensibus, pp. 570-577. Hearne's transcript, now our only source for the text of the poem, seems to have been a fair copy of the MS. The missing portions at the beginning and end of the poem can only have amounted to a few lines.

1834. More than a century elapsed before the poem was again printed by B. Thorpe in his Analecta Anglo-Saxonica, London, pp. 131-141 (revised edition, 1846), since when it has been a favourite with editors of Anglo-Saxon Analecta and Readers.

R. Wülker, in his Grundriss zur Geschichte der angelsächsischen Litteratur, 1885, gives a list of such editions of the Battle of Maldon :—

1835. Collectanea Anglo-Saxonica maximam partem nunc primum edita et vocabulario illustrata a Ludv. Chr. Müller. Havnia, 1835. Pp. 52-62.

1847. F. W. Ebeling's Angelsächsisches Lesebuch. Leipzig. Pp. 85-93.

1849. L. Klipstein's Analecta Anglo-Saxonica. New York. Vol. II, pp. 261-279.

1850. L. Ettmüller's Engla and Seaxna Scopas and Boceras. Quedlinburg and Leipzig. Pp. 133-140.

1857. Chr. Grein's Bibliothek der angelsächsischen Poesie. Göttingen. Vol. I, pp. 343-352.
 1861. M. Rieger's Alt- und angelsächsisches Lesebuch. Giessen. Pp. 84-94.
 1876. H. Sweet's Anglo-Saxon Reader. Oxford. Pp. 133-144. (7th ed., 1894. Text revised in 4th ed., 1884. Pp. 138-148.)
 1880. K. Körner's Einleitung in das Studium des Angelsächsischen. 2. Teil: Texte. Heilbronn, 1880. Pp. 72-88.
 1883. R. Wülcker's Bibliothek der angelsächsischen Poesie. Kassel. Vol. I, pp. 358-373.

To this list must now be added: —

1885. W. C. Robinson's Our Early English Literature. London.
 1888. F. Kluge's Angelsächsisches Lesebuch. Halle. Pp. 120-127. (2d ed., 1897; 3d ed., 1902. Pp. 132-139.)
 1891. J. W. Bright's Anglo-Saxon Reader. New York. Pp. 149-159. (3d ed., revised, 1894.)
 1897. C. L. Crow's Maldon and Brunnanburh. Boston. Pp. 1-12.

Part of the text is printed in Zupitza's Alt- und mittellenglisches Übungsbuch (5th ed., 1897; 6th ed., 1902).

III TRANSLATIONS

English

1826. Conybeare's Illustrations of Anglo-Saxon Poetry. London. (Prose, beginning with l. 17 of the poem.) Pp. xc-xcvi.
 1885. W. C. Robinson's Early English Literature. London.
 1887. H. W. Lumsden's article in Macmillan's Magazine. 55, 371 ff. (Reprinted in Cook and Tinker's Select Translations from Old English Poetry. Boston, 1902.)
 1889. J. M. Garnett's Elene, Judith, Athelstan, etc. Boston. (Enlarged edition, 1900.)
 1892. There is an excellent, spirited verse rendering in rhyming couplets of seven feet, by W. R. Sims, in Modern Language Notes, vol. VII, pp. 275-286.

1902. J. L. Hall's Judith, Phoenix and other Anglo-Saxon Poems Translated, etc. New York, Boston, Chicago. [1902.]

German

German versions are to be found in Körner's Einleitung, Heilbronn, 1880, and in U. Zernial's Das Lied von Byrhtnoth's Fall. Berlin, 1887.

IV CRITICISM, LANGUAGE, METRE, HISTORY, ETC.

U. Zernial in the treatise above mentioned gives an analysis of the language of the poem and of the light it throws on contemporary English life, as well as notes on the metre, and an appreciation of its poetical qualities.

D. Abegg, Zur Entwicklung der historischen Dichtung bei den Angelsachsen, Strassburg, 1894, discusses in detail the versification and phraseology of the poem and furnishes tables of words and phrases found also in the older epic poetry. This is an able and suggestive treatise.

See further Haack, Zeugnisse zur altenglischen Heldensage, Kiel, 1892; J. G. Foster's Judith, etc., Strassburg, 1892; and for metre, Rieger, Die alt- und angelsächsische Verskunst; Heinzel, Über den Stil der altgermanischen Poesie (Quellen und Forschungen, Heft X); and Sievers, P. B. Beiträge, X, 209-314, 451-520; Altgermanische Metrik, Halle, 1893.

No thorough examination of the dialect and 'grammar' of the poem has yet appeared.

E. A. Freeman in his Norman Conquest gives a spirited account of the battle of Maldon and a paraphrase of the poem. For Byrhtnoth's life and his connection with Ramsay and Ely, all that is known is brought together with much erudition and critical acumen by F. Liebermann in his article Zur Geschichte Byrhtnoths (Archiv für das Studium der neueren Sprachen, vol. 101, p. 15) where various points connected with the poem are incidentally discussed. Compare also Freeman, N. C., vol. I, and C. Plummer, Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, vol. II, p. 175.

The Histories of Ramsay and Ely, containing accounts of Byrht-noth's visits to the monasteries and his death, are printed in vol. III. of Thomas Gale's Historiæ Britannicæ Scriptores. The Life of Oswald is printed in The Historians of the Church of York, by J. Raine.

II SHORT POEMS FROM THE SAXON CHRONICLE

I MANUSCRIPTS

These poems occur in the various MSS. of the Chronicle, now six in number. A seventh formerly existed, Cott. Otho B xi, but it was burnt in 1731. Its text is preserved in Wheloc's edition.

The extant MSS. are : —

1. The Parker MS., in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, belonging originally to Christ Church, Canterbury. Written in various hands. From 892 to 1001 the entries are almost contemporary. Ends 1070.
2. Cott. Tib. A vi, in the British Museum, like all the other extant Cotton MSS. This is also a Canterbury MS., but had its origin in the Abbey of Abingdon in Berkshire. Written about 1000 in one hand. Ends 977.
3. Cott. Tib. B i, also came originally from Abingdon. Written in several hands. The last part perhaps contemporary, or written soon after the events. Ends 1066.
4. Cott. Tib. B iv. In various hands; written towards the end of the eleventh century, probably at Evesham in Worcestershire. Ends 1080.
5. Laud 636, in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Originally from Peterborough. Written in the first half of the twelfth century, in several hands. Ends 1154.
6. Cott. Domit. A viii., from Canterbury. Written, in one hand, towards end of eleventh century. Ends 1058, where the MS. is mutilated.

Poems I (Battle of Brunanburh) and II are found in MSS. 1, 2*, 3, 4; IIIa and IIIb in 1, 2*, 3; IV and V in 3*, 4.

The text of the present edition is based on the MS. marked in each case with an asterisk. For further details of the MSS. of the Chronicle and a discussion of their relations to each other and their archetypes, consult Plummer, vol. II, Introduction.

II EDITIONS

These songs have been printed in the various editions of the Chronicle. Three may be mentioned : —

1643. A. Wheloc, Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ gentis Anglorum libri V. Cantabrigiæ, MDCXLIII.

1861. B. Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. London (containing the text of all the MSS.).

1892-1899. C. Plummer, Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, with Supplementary Extracts from the Others. Two vols. Oxford, 1892 (Text), and 1899 (Introduction and Notes).

The Battle of Brunnanburh, the best known of these poems, has also been frequently reprinted in histories of English literature and in Anglo-Saxon Readers.

For a list of such editions see Wülker's Grundriss, to which add, as noted above, p. 46, F. Kluge, Lesebuch, 1st ed., pp. 118-120; 3d ed., pp. 130-132. J. W. Bright, Anglo-Saxon Reader, pp. 146-148. W. C. Robinson, Introduction. C. L. Crow, Maldon and Brunnanburh, pp. 13-17.

The other poems have been less often printed; they are to be found in Robinson's edition. The various readings of the MSS. and editors' emendations will be found in Grein-Wülker's Bibliothek, vol. I, pp. 374-388.

III TRANSLATIONS

Translations into English of the B. of B. are numerous; a few may be here noted : —

B. Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, vol. II.

Sharon Turner, History of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. III.

H. Morley, English Writers, vol. I.

J. Garnett, Elene, Athelstan and Byrhtnoth Translated.

Tennyson's Works, vol. VII, p. 187 ff.

W. C. Robinson, Our Early English Literature.

J. L. Hall, Judith, Phœnix, etc.

There are German versions in Ettmüller's Scopes Vidsidh, 1839; Körner's Einleitung, 1880; also in B. ten Brink's Geschichte der englischen Literatur, vol. I. There is a Danish trans. by J. Steenstrup, Normannerne, III.

The smaller poems are also translated in Robinson's edition.

IV CRITICISM, HISTORY, ETC.

L. Abegg, Zur Entwicklung der historischen Dichtung bei den Angelsachsen, deals in detail with the versification and language of these poems as well as of the Battle of Maldon, and examines their connection with the earlier epic poetry.

T. G. Foster, Judith, Studies, etc., pp. 100-103.

Plummer's edition of the Chronicle contains in vol. II a mass of varied and interesting information on the persons and places mentioned in the songs.

J. R. Green's Conquest of England should be read for an account of the events that led up to the Battle of Brunanburh.

The site of the battle is discussed by Plummer; in the Athenæum, Nos. 3016, 3017, 3020, 3023; the Antiquary, vol. XII, 168, 286; in Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, Vol. V (1889); and in the Deutsche Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft, vol. VI, 161.

III SONGS IN IRREGULAR METRE

These songs are printed in the editions of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and are discussed by Abegg, op. cit.; by H. Trautmann in Anglia, vol. II, pp. 166-173, and vol. VII, Anzeiger 211 ff.; and by F. Kluge in P. B. Beiträge, vol. IX, 422, Zur Geschichte des Reimes im Altgermanischen.

Glossary

[The order of words is strictly alphabetical, æ coming between ad and af, but initial ʒ following t. Both ʒ and þ are represented by ʒ in all cases. Roman numerals indicate the class of ablaut verbs; wk. 1, etc., that of the weak verbs; rd., the reduplicating; prp., the preteritive present verbs; anv., the anomalous verbs. When the designations of mood and tense are omitted, 'ind. pres.' is to be understood, unless some other designation has just preceded; when of mood only, supply 'ind.' if no other has preceded, otherwise the latter.]
